Introduction

There are only a few places left on this planet where Nature still holds sway, where man and his inventions have not yet breached prehistoric fortresses, and humans can still only explore hesitantly. Rarely do people hear of locations which haven't been completely mapped out and investigated by researchers and scientists alike. In the upper reaches of Northern Kerala, there exists one such place. From the very first step you take, you are enchanted by the unknown stretches that sprawl out in all directions. Every single trail you take is sacred, each turn holy to those who have dwelled and been protected by these forests for more than a few millennia. The greenery here defies mortal expectations, but it is the silence of the cicadas that gave the legendary Silent Valley National Park its name. It is here in God's Own Country that we encounter the legendary mysticism that the State is famous for at its absolute finest.

Geographical Features

The last bastion of evergreen vegetation in the Sahya ranges, the Silent Valley unveils a new surprise every few years, baiting scholars and nature lovers alike to continue their research into this magical green paradise. It is shielded by the Nilgiri Plateau to the North and the Mannarkkad Plains to the South and is the centrepiece of the Nilgiri Biosphere Reserve.

Historical Significance

Among the most integral parts of the Western Ghats, Silent Valley was christened a World Heritage Site by UNESCO in 2012. We are merely visitors to an ancient and undisturbed masterpiece, with the first explorations beginning only in the 19th century. The British are said to have stumbled across this area and sanctioned coffee plantations over a huge number of acres. But the land itself seemed to revolt, and with produce on the downfall, they were forced to leave it alone and simply watch as the forest reclaimed what was always its own.

Mythological Roots

A salient jewel of Palakkad district, Silent Valley has an interesting place in ancient Indian mythology. The place was originally called 'Sairandhrivanam'(the forest of Sairandhri or Panchali), because it was in these divine forests that Panchali and her Pandava husbands (from the epic Mahabharatha) are said to have sought refuge from their cousins, the Kauravas. Add on the fact that the very river that feeds and nurtures this entire area is called Kunthi(after the Pandavas' mother), and the bond seems even more legitimate.

Biodiversity

The sheer magnitude and diversity of the flora and fauna on display in Silent Valley is breath-taking. Visitors are informed that this area is home to tigers, leopards, elephants, snakes, Lion-Tailed Macaques and Malabar Giant Squirrels and hundreds of species of insects, including rare butterflies and moths. Sightings of the legendary Nilgiri Tahr have also been reported. Zoologists throng here in great numbers, as the chance to study these rare beings in their natural habitats is extremely rare. A flowing breeze, an occasional roar and magnificent climate greet all weary visitors. Some love idling by the River Kunthi, watching its ferocious waves carve the nearby rocks, as animals arrive in herds to play, bathe and congregate. Others are introduced to select pockets where one can camp, explore or leisurely absorb the ever prevalent green vibes of the Valley.

Social Significance

These hallowed grounds at Silent Valley have also seen one among the greatest people's movements in the world. A Hydroelectric Dam Project was proposed over River Kunthi in the early 1970's that would affect the livelihood of all life forms over an area of 830 hectares. Sustained protests, led by thousands of nature lovers, NGOs and the local populace ensured that the project was scrapped. It took over a decade to resolve the issue and resulted in Silent Valley being named a National Park. Even without a coordinated movement, people from far and wide thronged together to ensure that the innate beauty of the Park was maintained. In an era where media platforms did not have the reach they have today, it was a remarkable example of people coming together to conserve and protect the environment.

Ecotourism

keralatourism.org/ecotourism

This planet we are on nurtures over 7 billion inhabitants on a daily basis. While its marvels are beyond the realm of any one person's imagination, it is easy to notice the damages that are being caused on each and every front, due to the rise in population and the spread of civilization. Even the uninhabited corners of Mother Earth are now being turned into urban centres, and this affects the fragile balance that has kept the planet afloat this entire time.

Tourism is a great bonding element, mixing and mashing cultural experiences from across the world. People gain empathy for those they may have nothing in common with, with places their ancestors may never have heard of or traditions they could never have even dreamt of. Hence, the combination of environmentally driven ecological sites being used as prime tourist destinations leads to the wonderful concept of ecotourism.

Significance of Ecotourism

Ecotourism lets people appreciate the many boons that Mother Earth has bestowed us with. It is the epitome of making people realize the true value of the treasures that we are endangering with our reckless actions. It is the clarion call that resonates within ones soul in a seamless but provocative manner, evoking the basic empathy that is the first step in battling the environmental dangers we are facing in this day and age.

Ecotourism

at Silent Valley

At Silent Valley, its ecotourism initiatives are among the finest in the State. It has a plethora of packages that help one understand the deep-rooted process that has gone into maintaining the beauty of this forest. Our species arrived here late, but the locals and government together have managed to keep away the waves of urbanization from the place. Mari, a famous guide who descends from a line of famous guides of the place, is one among the best people to take you to the trails and paths that have been naturally maintained for eons. The stories told here talk about a concerted effort by everyone involved to ensure the park holds true to its roots.

Why Kerala

The majestic pines and peeking wildlife that greet you as you enter Silent Valley during your initial trek are hallmarks of Kerala and its endless bounty of natural beauty. Much of our lore and tradition emanates from these parts, and they are treasure troves of our past and heritage. They are priceless cultural landmarks, behemoths of history and proud jewels that adorn our vast landscape. Kerala and its people have known for a long time the immense responsibility they have inherited from their ancestors; true crusaders who ensured the well-being of this land for centuries. It is now our moment, our time in history, to repay the gifts that the land has blessed us with.

Hence, the people and governments at all levels have come together to formulate ways to conserve and protect the myriad floral and faunal species that grace our unique landscape. Concerted efforts have been made in the last few decades, alongside budgetary allotments and specific policy changes, that has made Kerala one among the pioneers in the Ecotourism movement around the world. Being a region with such an abundance of natural resources, it seems only fitting that we set an example and lead the way in the global resistance against any threats to our environment.
